HOW DID THE FUND PERFORM LAST YEAR AND WHAT AFFECTED ITS PERFORMANCE?

The year 2024 was characterized by global economic challenges and significant geopolitical developments. The ongoing tension between the U.S. and China remained central, with efforts to rebalance trade and address China's economic imbalances taking center stage. While China's economy grappled with domestic debt issues and sluggish growth, its global influence continued to shape markets and policy. The situation underscored the complexities of maintaining stability in an interconnected world where national interests often collide.

Domestically, the U.S. experienced robust equity market performance, driven predominantly by technology-focused mega-cap stocks. The S&P 500 gained 23.31%, marking its second consecutive year of 20%+ returns. This stellar performance was largely attributed to the "Magnificent 7," which surged over 65%, highlighting the dominance of a few key players in sectors like technology and telecommunications. However, this growth was uneven, as broader indices like the S&P 500 Equal-Weighted Index and smaller-cap stocks delivered more modest returns. International indices such as the MSCI EAFE and MSCI Emerging Markets showed steady gains, reflecting a global market still grappling with uneven recoveries across regions.

The fixed income market presented a mixed picture. While high-yield bonds outperformed, supported by strong economic fundamentals and narrowing credit spreads, longer-term rates moved significantly higher, posing challenges for traditional Treasury securities. The yield curve's bear steepening signaled shifts in market sentiment, as increased Treasury issuance and fiscal pressures added to concerns about sovereign debt stability. This backdrop suggests potential vulnerabilities in credit markets, particularly if sovereign debt turmoil spills over into broader financial conditions.
